Importance of Vaccination. Vaccination affords as perfect a protection from small pox as it is possible to obtain-as perfect immunity from danger as if the person had once passed through the small pox - Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal, 1845. To the Editor of the Chronicle:

Str.-I have been solicited to give my views as regards vaccination, to he publie The fact has been proved that, un to the year 1800 one of upwards of six thousand-persons, who were inocculated with the small pox after previous vaccination, not a sing's one thus took the diseass. 'But," says the fav rors of inoccu ation, "this is not the case now. A person who has had small pox, or been nocculated are seerafter free from all further chance of infection, or if he he again attacked it is an extremely mild form; whilst we fr quently meet with small p: x occurring after raceination and lie information and on demand exhibit then protes quite as fatal as if the person had not adopted this precention" her slave has been enlisted. Trestatistics of the London Small P x Hospital proves such coinions to be very erroneous. They show that of those who had the small pex 222 died in 109, while those who had been previously warringted died in the small proportion of 58 in 100 The su health's on this point are then ranged together, and their sts ements compared, from which it appears that, whi'e those who take small pox for the second time die in the average proportion of 15 7 per cent; those who take it after vergination only die in the proportion of 33 per cent on an average. The instances recorded prove that a second attack of small pox is for from being very uncommor, and that when it does occur, it is far more fatal than small pox after vaccination. The result of revaccination compared with vaccination of those who had had small pox were, both in Hanover and Wurtemberg, exactly in the same proportion. From this we must conclude that vaccination gives us perfect immunity from a subsequent attack of small pox, as if a person had once passed through the small pox itself More than this we can never ask-more than this we can never obtain. If of years which I most unbesitatingly deny, so do those of an attack of small pox itself. And if theorists imagine and endeavor to prove that a person ought to be revaccinated every twelve or twenty years, I hold it just as equally necessary that the person who has had small pox be, after the same space by means of innoculation, that he may not fall a victim to the disease should

The latter proposition is so preposter-ous that I cannot imagine any one so The obtuse as not to see its absurdity. And if it be so, certainly not less so is the proposal to revaccinate.

In conclusion, then, it may be remarked that the above facts establish that the existing prevalence and mortality of small pox is not owing to any failure in ter a certain number of years, but to the neglect of vaccination altogether; and that vaccination affords a greater protection from a fatal termination, attacked with small pox, than if he had to every child in the land. passed through the natural or innoculated small p x themselves.
